It is important that authors identify and credit other people's work to avoid accusations of plagiarism.

Authors are responsible for obtaining permission to use any textual or visual copyright material contained in their journal article and conference paper submissions.

This includes photographs, maps, figures, logos, tables, quotations, archival objects, screen shots and tv or audio clips. Some government forms are also under copyright.

If you are using imagery, data, or other copyright sources, please acknowledge in the article that the material is reproduced with permission from the rights owner. These permissions must be obtained before the article is submitted to KnE Publishing. If you do not receive explicit permission, you cannot reproduce this material in your article, and will have to remove it before publication.

When material is already in the public domain and is no longer under copyright protection you do not have to obtain permission. Remember, however, that copyright duration varies depending on region and material type. Moreover, translations can remain under copyright after the original version is out of copyright.

If you are uncertain as to whether you need to obtain permission or unsure what form crediting a source should take, contact the Museum / Library / Publisher / Owner for clarification regarding the non-exclusive right to reproduce the material.

There might be a fee to obtain the rights to re-use this content. KnE Publishing will not pay this fee, the costs are borne by the author(s) or their funding bodies.

By offering this article to us for publication you are warranting that either all material is in the public domain or that you are licenced by the owner to permit us to publish it without any further consent or payment.
